Abstract

Tom Livingston, Illinois Statecraft, ISG-A-L-2011-007

Biographical Information Overview of Interview: Tom Livingston was born on August 14th, 1967 in Urbana, Illinois, and grew up in LaGrange, a Chicago suburb, graduating from the Alliance Township High School in 1985. He then attended the University of Illinois, majoring in communications and broadcasting, and soon found himself busy with extracurricular activities, including a campus fraternity, school government, and for two and a half years, playing the role of Chief Illiniwek, the school mascot, at sporting events and other school activities.

Livingston graduated in 1990, and because of a chance encounter he had in the summer of 1989 at a anti drunk driving event where then Secretary of State Jim Edgar was present, he was asked to join the Edgar gubernatorial campaign after his graduation, helping to conduct opposition research. Following Edgar's election, the new governor asked Livingston to serve as his travel aid. He did that job for two years, then became the governor's scheduler. In 1995, following Edgar's reelection, Livingston moved to the Edgar's policy staff, focusing his efforts on higher education reform, capital development, transportation and infrastructure issues. He was at the heart of Edgar's effort to reorganize Illinois's universities, and with the conflict that Edgar had with Mayor Richard M. Daley over Chicago's Meigs Field. He stayed with the administration for all eight years, and afterward, moved to the private sector, eventually working for CSX, the rail freight company.
