

When it comes to speed and Abraham Lincoln, most people would think of the 16th President's good friend Joshua Speed. But not the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum's good friends at Brandt. When the Brandt leadership thinks of Lincoln and speed, they think NASCAR. So it was of no surprise when the company unveiled a special tribute to the farmer's son-who-would-be-president, at the NASCAR Sprint Cup MyAFibStory.com 400 at Chicagoland Speedway in Joliet this past Sunday.

As the Brandt car, numbered 51 and driven by Justin Allgaier was rolled out for competition, it proudly sported the special 10th anniversary logo of the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum for all the racing world to see. Given a place of honor, the logo appears just left of the car's number--a place of prominence usually reserved for major sponsors, but this time reserved for a major president. It's unclear what Lincoln, if he were alive today, would have thought about his 400 mile journey around the track at some 200 miles per hour, but we're sure he would be grateful for the generous in-kind support from Brandt--professionals in agriculture and philanthropic to the core. Thank you, Brandt!
