As a commercial film maker for 25 years, I share the frustration regarding location searches. A great scout is one that has the ability to understand the directors aesthetic intent and translate that into a perfect location. We know what directors want to see from a location scout (but often do not) and what critical information producers need (and often do not get).

I have been styling for many years and find myself involved in most facets of that area. I usually work on set with model doing basic hair, makeup, props and wardrobe and general people wrangling when needed. I also do location scouting and even have done some basic food styling. I would consider myself an all around styling with good people skills and creativity. I have done casting of talent as well, including street casting.

I have been styling for many years and find myself involved in most facets of that area. I usually work on set with model doing basic hair, makeup, props and wardrobe and general people wrangling when needed. I also do location scouting and even have done some basic food styling. I would consider myself an all around styling with good people skills and creativity. I have done casting of talent as well, including street casting.

I am a writer/producer/director who has moved back to Chicago after 20 years working in Los Angeles, creating promos, sizzle reels and upfront presentations, plus directing green screen & location shoots and BTS segments, as well as conducting man-on-the-street interviews. I'm comfortable directing/interviewing everyone from celebrities and CEOs to VO talent and "real people". And I love working in edit bays, collaborating with editors on the finished product.
